Subject: Microsoft case

Sirs:

Since DOS ver. 3, I have used products produced by Microsoft. They have been quality products, designed to make our lives easier. Microsoft has beaten their competition in the market place. I now use Windows 2000 and Office XP. I am very pleased with these products.

I do not feel that the Justice Dept. has been fair in their pursuit of Microsoft. I do not feel that the Justice Dept. and the states involved have the best interest of me, the end user, in view in this case. This case has communicated one thing quite clearly - If you have good products, can beat your competitions and produce exceptional growth, the government will surely treat you very badly. Microsoft has helped our nation. Microsoft has changed the way we do things, making life easier. Why are we punishing a good thing?

I remember when the government took Kodak to task over film patents because Kodak had done too well in building good products. Kodak was forced to release some of those patents. Today Japan controls the film market. Is that what the Justice Dept. wants to do to Microsoft?

Sincerely,

Phillip D. Mosher
